

OCCUPY ADECCO!

ADECCO: Stop Supplying Strikebreakers to the ABB factory in Cordoba, Spain.

Employment agencies have long been criticised for profiting from casualisation and for creating an insecure job market. However, ADECCO has now taken this to a whole new level. Not content to simply lower wages and job security through precarious short term contracts, ADECCO has now gotten into the business of strikebreaking.

Spanish workers at multinational Asea Boveri Brown are angry about their working conditions, and the management's refusal to address this led to strike action. First management responded by hiring scab labour from ADECCO. Then they sacked the factory strike committee. Now ABB has sacked all the striking workers. By continuing to provide strikebreakers, ADECCO is complicit in ABB's union-busting.

The workers of the ABB electrical factory in Spain are demanding what all workers deserve: fair pay, respect on the job, and a safe working environment. Austerity is providing employers in the public and private sectors alike with the excuse to attack our pay and working conditions. We must stand together—across borders, industries and trade unions—and fight back.

We're here today to demand that ABB reinstate the sacked strikers, begin talks with their workforce, and that ADECCO cease—now and forever—to offer scab labour during industrial disputes.
